Coming Full Circle to Help Her Community

SAVANNAH SCOTT

Growing up in Fairbanks, Alaska, Savannah Scott noticed how factors like poverty and housing insecurity were taking a toll on the health of her community. She believed that studying pre-med was her best way to make a difference, until a Hollins professor encouraged her to enroll in the Introduction to Public Health course.

After completing several significant internships, Savannah was eventually put in touch with a CDC official who helped her apply for the CDC's Public Health Associate program. She was accepted and selected to return to Fairbanks and serve with the Tanana Chiefs Conference, an Alaska Native nonprofit organization—a move that she calls “my journey back home.”

Pursuing Her Passions in the Art World

FAITH HERRINGTON

Faith Herrington, who describes herself as a “passionate lover of art history,” was named 2022's recipient of the Jean Cushwa College Internship: a paid position awarded to one college student who is earning a degree in fine arts or a similar field.

Building on her experience of conducting historical research in Greece and Italy, the internship allows her to implement her research and exhibition installation skills while engaging with something she truly loves. Her time at Hollins helped her to “appreciate the value of an arts education as a means to explore any subject, time period, philosophy, and culture.” Faith was able to carry that knowledge and appreciation with her into her post-graduate internship.

Zahin Mahbuba was one of 251 students selected as a University Innovation Fellow by Stanford's Hasso Plattner Institute of Design, a program that empowers students to be changemakers for their schools. For Zahin, that gave her the opportunity to pursue her passion for building educational programs in developing nations while leaving a lasting legacy at Hollins.

Zahin worked closely with a faculty sponsor during the rigorous application process and went on to create a first-year seminar at Hollins with a focus on “Sustainability and Social Innovation.” She graduated from Hollins in three years and joined a legal firm while exploring Ph.D. programs in higher education and policy reform.
